SENTINEL REFRESHED

It is quite common for products to evolve over time and Sentinel has recently undergone some improvements that make it much more reliable. The initial model included a Master RAD to which all Auxiliary RADs synchronized via wireless communication. The new version uses the 24vac line for power and synchronization, eliminating the Master RAD. This also eliminates the line-of-site requirement between RADs for synchronization.

As a consequence of Master RAD elimination, the Auxiliary RADs are now plainly called RADs and the EAS RAD normally installed at points of egress are now most appropriately called Guard RADs. Confusing? Not really once you consider that a "Guard" RAD at an exit makes much more sense as a name.

All other functions remain unchanged. The functional description and specification documents have been updated and uploaded to our website.
